Using the law to help your clients on the road to financial recovery

You're helping your client to get out of a terrible relationship. Their next step is going to be rebuilding a life for themselves. Here are some of the financial issues they might be facing and how you can use the law to help them regain control over their life.

Crippling debt

If your client is struggling to repay debts, they can enter hardship arrangements with their creditors. This will put a temporary hold on repayments or allow them to make reduced repayments while they are experiencing financial hardship.

Joint debt

If you can show that your client was pressured into a loan or that the loan was solely for the ex-partner's benefit, and that the lender should have known this, your client might be entitled to be released from the debt and could potentially get some money back. Call us to find out what your client's best option is.

Joint bills

Your client might be stuck with utility and phone bills under joint names. The best thing you can do for your client in this situation is to make a complaint to the Ombudsman. The Telecommunications Industry Ombudsman and the Energy and Water Ombudsman offer free dispute resolution services and their decisions are binding on the company complained about.

Poor credit history

It may be possible for your client to remove unpaid debts that are listed on their credit history, if there were problems with the contract, if the debt is more than six years old or if the listing contains an error. Call us to find out how you can use the law to help your client. You can also refer to our Credit Reporting toolkit if your client is worried about their credit history.

Unaffordable loans

Lenders have an obligation to lend responsibly and to avoid entering a loan with someone who they know will be unable to pay it back. If your client has entered a loan that they could never have paid back, they might not have to pay the fees and interest incurred. Call us to find out what you can say to the lender to negotiate a better outcome for your client.
